The Verdict: How the NNP Lost Grenada, How the NDC Won It, and the Road Back for 2030/31

Fifteen constituencies, 282 polling divisions and one conclusion: the NNP did not lose 14 seats on polling day, but over four years, through decisions of its own making, while the NDC executed a plan. The way back is narrower than it looks, and shorter than it feels: 1,765 voters in seven seats.

ST. GEORGE'S, GRENADA—For fifteen weeks this journal has examined Grenada's 2026 general election one constituency at a time, from the three-vote split in the Town of St. George to the hurricane-battered polling stations of Carriacou and Petite Martinique. This volume brings the fifteen together.

> "The NNP did not lose 14 seats on polling day. It lost them over four years, through decisions it made itself."

The picture that emerges is not of a party swept away by a wave it could not have foreseen. It is of a party that made a series of choices between 2022 and 2026, about its leadership, its members, its candidates and its organisation, and lost seat after seat as a consequence. Opposite it stood a governing party that chose its moment, kept its candidates in place and worked its constituencies. The numbers show both with clarity, and they also show that the road back to government in 2030/31 remains open, provided the NNP sets out on it now.

PART ONE: THE SCALE OF THE DEFEAT

On 5th November 2026 the NDC won 14 of the 15 seats with 37,369 votes; the NNP won one seat with 22,567 votes; and all other parties and independents together took 1,328. Measured as a share of the vote for the two main parties, the NNP fell from 48.0 per cent in 2022 to 37.7 per cent, a swing of 10.3 points and the worst result in the party's history.

The raw votes are more telling still. The NNP lost 6,392 votes compared with 2022, while the NDC gained 5,939. Over the same four years the register grew by 10,374 names, yet only 607 more ballots were cast, and turnout fell from 70.2 per cent to 63.3 per cent.

Measured against the whole electorate, the NDC's share rose from 36.3 per cent of all registered voters to 38.5 per cent, while the NNP's fell from 33.4 per cent to 23.3 per cent. The NDC did not sweep the country through mass conversion. It held its voters, added some new ones, and watched the NNP's support drain away, much of it into abstention.

The polling-division returns give the depth of the defeat concrete form. Of the 282 polling divisions published by the Parliamentary Elections Office, the NNP carried 38, and fourteen of those were in St. George North West, the one seat it held. In the other fourteen constituencies it won 24 divisions out of 267, and in six of them, St. George South, St. George North East, St. George South East, St. David, St. Patrick West and the Town of St. George, it did not win a single division.

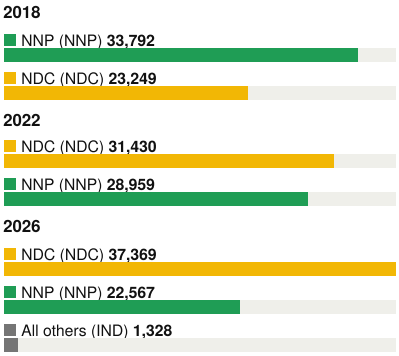

EVERY SEAT MOVED THE SAME WAY

The NNP's share of the two-party vote fell in all fifteen constituencies. The smallest fall, 2.4 points, came in St. George North West, where Dr. Keith Mitchell handed over to Dr. Adrian Joseph; the largest, 24.6 points, came in the Town of St. George, where Peter David's breakaway took 730 votes. Between those extremes, the pattern is consistent enough to be read as evidence.

Where the NNP ran a candidate the voters already knew, the fall was smaller than the national swing: 5.4 points in St. Andrew South East, 6.3 in St. John and 8.0 in St. Andrew North East. Where it ran a new candidate, or one named late, the fall matched the national swing or exceeded it: 9.0 in St. Andrew South West, 9.6 in St. David, 10.2 in St. Patrick East, 10.8 in Carriacou and Petite Martinique, 11.3 in St.

The NNP's local decisions, in other words, determined how badly each seat went. The national mood set the direction; the party's own choices set the magnitude.

PART TWO: THE TEN FAILURES OF THE NNP

What follows is not a catalogue of misfortunes. Each failure was a decision, or the absence of one, and each is visible in the results.

1. A LEADERSHIP TRANSITION LEFT TOO LATE AND HANDLED BADLY

The NNP's convention to choose a successor to Dr. Mitchell was held on 15th December 2024, some two years overdue. The contest lay between Emmalin Pierre and Peter David, and Mr. David withdrew hours before the vote, alleging that the process was rigged, before resigning from the party the following month. The New Today's editorial judgement was that Dr. Mitchell had badly mishandled the transition.

A leadership change two years before an election is already late; a contested one that ends with the losing candidate leaving the party is worse. It cost the NNP a sitting MP, a branch executive in the capital and, in the end, the Town of St. George itself, lost by three votes to the split.

2. TWO OF SIX ELECTED MEMBERS LOST BEFORE POLLING DAY

The NNP won six seats in 2022, and within three years it had lost two of the members who won them. Delma Thomas resigned in May 2023, saying that her attempts to represent St. Andrew North West from within the party had been frustrated, and joined the NDC government; Mr. David left in January 2025.

Both seats were lost in 2026. Ms. Thomas won St. Andrew North West for the NDC by 785, and Mr. David's new party split the vote in the Town. A party that cannot keep its own elected members cannot keep their seats, and the NNP lost a third of its parliamentary group to departures alone.

3. CARETAKERS NAMED LATE

In the seats lost in 2022, the NNP waited almost three years to name new caretakers. Four were presented on 23rd April 2025, for St. David, St. George South, St. Patrick West and St. Andrew South West, about 19 months before polling day, and Norland Cox was named for Carriacou and Petite Martinique in September 2025, about 14 months before.

Every one of those five seats fell by at least 9 points, three of them by more than the national swing. Nineteen months is not long enough to become known in a constituency of 5,000 to 12,000 voters, least of all against a sitting minister.

4. CARETAKERS WITHOUT THE MEANS TO CAMPAIGN

In 2025 The New Today reported speculation that several of the new caretakers, including the one in St. George South, were working without party offices. In the same report a former NNP minister said that only sitting NNP MPs had constituency offices, funded by the state, and accused the party leadership of doing too little to help the newcomers financially.

In February 2026 the NNP announced that it was the first party to name a full slate of 15 candidates. A full slate is a press release; an office, staff, a household list and a budget are a campaign. In too many seats the NNP had the former without the latter.

5. CANDIDATE CHURN AND PARACHUTING

In St. George South, the country's largest seat, the NNP fielded four different candidates in four elections, and its 2022 candidate there, Mr. Cox, was moved to Carriacou for 2026 and lost both seats. Voters notice when a candidate is posted rather than rooted.

The NDC did the opposite. David Andrew lost St. Andrew South East in 2022, stayed, and won it in 2026, while Ron Redhead, Kerryne James and Lennox Andrews all defended seats they had won four years earlier, and all increased their majorities.

6. SUCCESSION LEFT TO CHANCE

The NNP's single best result of 2026 came from the one seat in which succession was planned. Dr. Mitchell announced his retirement on 22nd January 2026 and named Dr. Joseph the same night, ten months before polling day, and the NNP's share in St. George North West fell by only 2.4 points.

Where long-serving members left without a comparable public handover, the results were far worse: in St. Mark the NNP's share fell 14.3 points after Clarice Modeste-Curwen left the ballot, and in St. George South East, without Gregory Bowen, it fell 11.3. The lesson is not complicated; the party simply did not apply it.

7. THE LEADER IN A MARGINAL SEAT

Ms. Pierre's majority in St. Andrew South East had fallen from 1,158 in 2018 to 233 in 2022. The party then made her its leader, its Leader of the Opposition and its national campaigner. In 2026 her own vote fell by only 44, but the NDC found 351 more, and she lost by 162.

A party leader in a marginal seat needs a full-time local campaign behind her so that she is free to travel, and there is no public sign that St. Andrew South East had one.

8. THE NNP'S OWN VOTERS STAYED HOME

The largest single failure lies in the turnout figures. Across the country the NNP lost 6,392 votes even as the total number of ballots rose by 607, and in seat after seat the NDC's share of the electorate held steady while the NNP's fell. In St. Andrew North East the register grew by 647 and ballots by six, and the NNP lost 339 votes, more than the 320 by which it lost the seat; in St. George North East and St. George South, turnout fell by almost ten points.

These are not voters whom the NDC persuaded. They are voters the NNP did not reach, and they are also the cheapest votes to win back.

9. A MESSAGE THAT DID NOT LAND

The NNP's campaign asked whether voters were better off four years on, and offered specific measures such as removing VAT on sugar within 90 days; neither cut through. The election was called almost a year early, leaving the opposition little more than a month of formal campaigning, and a party that has not been in constant contact with voters cannot introduce a programme in five weeks.

After the result, the political scientist Peter Wickham suggested that Ms. Pierre should consider stepping down to allow the party to renew itself. Whatever one makes of that, the campaign's central argument plainly failed to move the voters who had supported the NNP in 2022.

10. THE CAPITAL LOST TO A SPLIT

The Town of St. George is the clearest example of a self-inflicted defeat. The NDC won it with 1,269 votes, while the NNP and Mr. David's DPM together had 1,266: a difference of three votes, rooted in a split that began at the NNP's own convention.

Nowhere else did the DPM decide a seat. In the capital, however, it did, and the NNP's own internal politics created it.

PART THREE: HOW THE NDC EXECUTED

A fair verdict must also credit the winner. The NDC did not win 14 seats by accident, and an opposition that does not understand how it was beaten will be beaten again.

IT CHOSE THE BATTLEFIELD AND THE DATE

Prime Minister Dickon Mitchell advised dissolution on 2nd October 2026, with nominations set for 15th October and polling for 5th November, almost a year before the constitutional deadline. A governing party with a record to run on, facing an opposition still organising, is best served by a short campaign, and that is precisely what the NDC chose.

IT KEPT ITS CANDIDATES AND WORKED ITS SEATS

Every NDC member elected in 2022 who stood again in 2026 increased their majority: Andy Williams from 1,068 to 2,792 in St. George South; Ron Redhead from 1,087 to 2,027 in St. George North East; Phillip Telesford from 488 to 1,294 in St. George South East; Kerryne James from 7 to 573 in St. John; Lennox Andrews from 425 to 1,094 in St. Andrew South West; Joseph Andall from 268 to 1,160 in St. Patrick West; Tevin Andrews from 149 to 976 in Carriacou; and the Prime Minister himself from 1,672 to 3,180 in St. David.

In most of those seats the NDC's share of the whole electorate held steady or rose. Its members were present between elections, and the voters rewarded them for it.

IT GAVE ITS PEOPLE VISIBLE ROLES

The NDC used government to raise the profile of its members in their own seats. Mr. Williams served repeatedly as Acting Prime Minister; Mr. Andall became Foreign Minister; Ms. James held the climate and environment portfolio; and Mr. Andrew, after losing in 2022, became Minister of Education and returned to win. Each appointment made the local member a national figure in the eyes of their own constituents.

IT WELCOMED DEFECTORS AND TARGETED NNP SEATS

When Ms. Thomas left the NNP in 2023, the NDC brought her into government, and she held St. Andrew North West in its colours. The party then pursued the NNP's remaining seats, with the Prime Minister singling out St. Mark when he announced the election. Of the six seats the NNP held in 2022, the NDC took five: St. Andrew South East, St. Andrew North East, St. Andrew North West, St. Mark and the Town of St. George.

IT GOVERNED THROUGH A DISASTER AND WAS CREDITED FOR IT

Hurricane Beryl devastated Carriacou and Petite Martinique in July 2024. The government controlled the recovery, and the NDC's member there, the party's chairman, was its local face; his majority rose from 149 to 976. Incumbency in a crisis is a powerful advantage, and the NDC used it.

None of this constitutes a secret method. It is what disciplined parties do: select candidates early, keep them in place, give them visible work, and turn up between elections. The NNP did all of these things in its years of dominance, and it can do them again.

PART FOUR: THE ARITHMETIC OF 2030/31

Government requires eight seats, and the NNP holds one. On a uniform national swing it would need to recover about 12.8 points of the two-party vote, to roughly 50.5 per cent nationally, to reach eight. That sounds daunting, but elections are not won on uniform swings; they are won seat by seat.

Rank the fourteen lost seats by the number of voters who would have had to switch sides for the NNP to win in 2026, and seven of them are within reach: St. Andrew South East needed 82 switchers, St. Mark 131, St. Andrew North East 161, St. John 287, St. Patrick East 344, the Town of St. George 367 against the NDC alone, and St. Andrew North West 393. Together that is 1,765 voters, under 3 per cent of the 61,460 ballots cast in 2026. Hold St. George North West, win those seven, and the NNP has eight.

In the Town of St. George the arithmetic is closer still than it appears. The NNP and the DPM together had 1,266 votes to the NDC's 1,269, so a reunited opposition there begins just three votes behind.

Behind that first tier sit Carriacou and Petite Martinique (489 switchers), St. Andrew South West (548), St. Patrick West (581) and St. George South East (648), the seats that would turn a narrow majority into a working one. The third tier, comprising St. George North East (1,014), St. George South (1,397) and St. David (1,591), is a two-election project.

PART FIVE: WHAT THE NNP MUST DO TO STAND A CHANCE

What follows is a plan, not a wish list. Every item is measurable, and every item answers one of the failures set out above.

SETTLE THE LEADERSHIP PROPERLY, AND EARLY

The party's leadership must be settled by an open, fair and transparent process that every faction accepts, by the end of 2027 at the latest. Whether the outcome is Ms. Pierre or another leader matters less than that the process is clean and the result final. The 2024 convention, two years late and ending in a walkout, must not be repeated, and whoever leads should not also be defending a marginal seat without a full-time deputy and organiser at home.

BRING THE FAMILY BACK TOGETHER

The NNP lost two members to departures and the capital to a split. Reconciliation, with former members and with those who left alongside them, is not sentiment but arithmetic; in the Town alone it is worth the three votes that separated the opposition from victory. The party should open formal talks with former members and with the DPM's supporters in 2027, and create a clear route back for any who wish to return.

NAME EVERY CANDIDATE BY THE END OF 2027, AND KEEP THEM

The party should adopt a rule that every constituency has a confirmed candidate at least 18 months before an election, and that the candidate is committed to two elections unless they choose to step aside. Candidates should live in, or have deep roots in, the seat they contest. Moving candidates between constituencies, and fielding four candidates in four elections, must end.

FUND THE FIELD, CENTRALLY

Every Tier 1 seat needs a permanent office, a paid organiser and a monthly budget from 2028, funded centrally by the party rather than left to the candidate, with Tier 2 seats following in 2029. The cost is modest compared with what was lost, and it answers directly the complaint that caretakers were left without offices in 2025.

BUILD A VOTER FILE AND A CAPTAIN IN EVERY DIVISION

The NNP needs a household-level voter file for all 282 polling divisions, starting from its 2022 vote, when 28,959 people voted for the party. It should recruit a captain for every division, with quarterly targets for contacts, publish progress to members every six months, and contact every known 2022 supporter at least three times a year. Those 6,392 lost voters are the cheapest votes the party will ever win back.

REGISTER THE NEW VOTERS

The register grew by 10,374 names between 2022 and 2026, and the NNP found few of them. The party should run a permanent registration drive aimed at young people, returning nationals and new residents, with a monthly target in every constituency; in St. David alone the register grew by 1,444, and in St. George South by 1,200.

PLAN EVERY SUCCESSION IN PUBLIC

Every NNP constituency with a long-serving member should have a named successor, announced publicly with the member's support, at least two years before the election. St. George North West proved that the method works; St. Mark and St. George South East demonstrated what happens without it.

EARN A MESSAGE IN THE CONSTITUENCIES FIRST

A national programme cannot be introduced in five weeks. The party should run listening programmes in every Tier 1 and Tier 2 seat from 2028, by sector as well as by village: hotel and airport workers in the south, fishers in Gouyave and Soubise, farmers in St. Andrew and St. Patrick, students and staff at SGU and TAMCC, and the families rebuilding after Beryl. The 2030/31 manifesto should be built from what people say and published a full year before the election is due, and the government should be held to account in public through quarterly constituency report cards measured against its own promises.

BE READY FOR AN EARLY ELECTION

The NDC called the 2026 election almost a year early, and it may do so again. Every target seat must therefore be ready for a five-week campaign from the beginning of 2029, with the candidate in place, the office open, the voter file current, captains trained, and transport and polling-day plans written. A party that is ready early cannot be ambushed by the calendar.

A TIMELINE FOR THE NEXT FOUR YEARS

2027: settle the leadership; open reconciliation talks; adopt the candidate and succession rules; confirm candidates in all seven Tier 1 seats; and begin the voter file from the 2022 vote.

2028: open funded offices in all Tier 1 seats; recruit captains for every Tier 1 division; begin listening programmes; start monthly registration drives; and confirm candidates in all remaining seats.

2029: open offices in Tier 2 seats; complete the recruitment of captains in all 282 divisions; publish quarterly report cards on sitting members; and be ready for an early election from January.

2030: publish the manifesto at least a year before the election is due; run turnout operations built on the voter file; and measure every seat against its target number of switchers and supporters, reporting the results to members.

THE VERDICT

The NNP lost in 2026 because it spent four years on internal conflict, late decisions and thin organisation, while the NDC spent them working its seats. That is a hard verdict, but also a hopeful one, because every one of those failures lies within the party's own power to correct.

Seven seats, fewer than 1,800 voters, and four years: the road back to government is narrower than the NNP's supporters would wish, yet far shorter than the result of 5th November makes it feel. The question is not whether it can be done, but whether the party will begin now.

WHAT IT MEANS FOR 2030/31

1. Settle the leadership openly, cleanly and by the end of 2027.
2. Keep elected members inside the party: two of six walked and both seats fell.
3. Reunite the opposition: in the Town it is three votes from victory.
4. Name every candidate by the end of 2027, and keep them for two elections.
5. No parachuting, and no four candidates in four elections.
6. Fund offices and organisers centrally, Tier 1 first.
7. Build a voter file and a captain in all 282 divisions.
8. Win back the 6,392 NNP voters of 2022 before chasing anyone else.
9. Plan every succession in public, as in St. George North West.
10. Be ready for an early election from January 2029.
