How a Three-Vote Split Cost the NNP the Capital

The NDC didn't ride a wave into the Town of St. George. The opposition divided its own vote, and the NNP's wounds were self-inflicted, opened nearly two years before polling day. Claudette Joseph won with 1,269 votes. Peter David and Troy Noel had 1,266 between them.

TOWN OF ST. GEORGE, GRENADA—In the 5th November general election, political commentators expected Peter David to be the kingmaker in the capital. Instead the veteran politician, running for the first time under the banner of his new Democratic People's Movement, polled 730 votes. Attorney General Claudette Joseph of the governing NDC took the Town of St. George with 1,269. The NNP's candidate, Troy Noel, drew 536.

Put the two opposition tallies together and they reach 1,266: three votes short of the winner. Not every David voter would have backed an NNP candidate, and a share of his support crossed party lines. But the arithmetic tells the story of the night in the capital. This was a split-opposition loss, not a rejection of the NNP in town.

A SMALL SEAT, WHERE EVERY HOUSEHOLD CAN BE REACHED

The Town of St. George is one of the smallest constituencies in the country. This year it had 4,242 registered voters, and 2,555 ballots were cast. About 1,300 votes wins it. That means a determined candidate can personally reach almost every household in the seat, and a divided party can lose it on a handful of streets.

A PARTY DIVIDED

The NNP's troubles began at its own convention. Mr. David was one of only two contenders for the party leadership in December 2024. He withdrew hours before the vote on 15th December, saying the process had been rigged in favour of Emmalin Pierre. On 20th January 2025, a little over a month after the party elected its new executive, he resigned from the NNP.

Losing a leadership race became losing a sitting member of Parliament, then his base, and finally the seat. The split never healed. Mr. David went on to found the Democratic People's Movement and lead it into the 2026 election.

A BRANCH THAT COLLAPSED

The damage reached the constituency machine within days. That same January the NNP's General Secretary confirmed that several executive members of its Town of St. George constituency group had resigned, leaving the party without a working local organisation in the capital for most of the cycle.

In a seat this small, the branch is the campaign. Without one, the NNP entered the 2026 election in the capital with no organisation to find its voters, no canvass list and no one to run polling day.

A CANDIDATE TOO LATE

When the NNP finally named a flag-bearer for the capital, it chose Troy Noel, who is originally from the Darbeau area of the constituency but now lives at Hope Vale, in St. George South East. A candidate who lived outside the seat, named late in the cycle, had little time to build the trust that a capital constituency rewards.

The result was the worst NNP performance anywhere in the country. The party's vote in the Town fell from 1,329 in 2022 to 536, a loss of 793. Its share of the vote for the two main parties fell 24.6 points, more than twice the national swing.

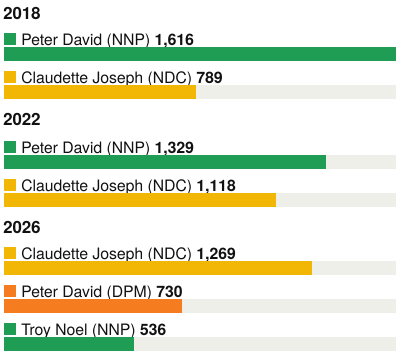

WHERE THE SPLIT HAPPENED

The polling-division results show the split street by street. The DPM finished ahead of the NNP in 10 of the 12 divisions. The NNP beat the DPM only at the two St. George's Anglican Senior School divisions.

Combined, the NNP and the DPM carried all five divisions at the National Stadium, the largest polling site, by 779 votes to the NDC's 609. The NDC won the seat in the older parts of town: at the Berean Christian Academy by 148 to 80 for the two opposition parties combined, at Norton's Hall on Church Street by 92 to 62, and at the Magistrate's Court by 52 to 33.

At Marryshow House the NDC won by 69 votes to 67 for the NNP and DPM together. At the St. George's SDA School it won by 123 to 119. Those two divisions alone were decided by six votes.

PERSISTENCE PAYS FOR THE NDC

Ms. Joseph's victory came on her third attempt. In 2018 Mr. David, then the NNP's candidate, beat her by 1,616 votes to 789. In 2022 he beat her again, by 1,329 to 1,118. She kept showing up.

Her vote in 2026, 1,269, was only 151 more than in 2022. She did not need to grow much. She needed the opposition to divide, and it did. Her share of all registered voters barely moved, from 29.6 to 29.9 per cent. The NNP's fell from 35.1 to 12.6 per cent.

WHY THE TIDE RAN SO STRONGLY

The split explains the capital. It doesn't explain a 14–1 national landslide, in which the NDC took 61 per cent of the vote. Several forces beyond the NNP's own troubles were at work.

A record to run on. Analyst Derek Ramsamooj said Prime Minister Dickon Mitchell had shown he could use the office to deliver, and that voters were accepting new, young and dynamic leadership. The government has also pointed to strong economic growth after Hurricane Beryl and record citizenship-by-investment revenue.

The government chose the battlefield. Mr. Mitchell called the vote almost a year early, and the NDC had its campaign planned before the opposition was ready.

The end of an era. This was the NNP's first campaign in decades without Dr. Keith Mitchell at its head. Political scientist Peter Wickham noted that Dickon Mitchell has now beaten both the party's greatest figure and the party he left behind.

A quieter electorate. Turnout fell to 63.3 per cent, down from 70.2 per cent in 2022. In the Town it fell from 65.1 to 60.2 per cent.

THE LIMITS OF A THIRD PARTY

For Mr. David the problem was structural. Grenada's first-past-the-post system has long been a two-party contest, and anyone running outside the two dominant parties faces steep odds. The DPM drew 1,189 votes nationwide, and its leader lost his own seat.

His history also caught up with him. Mr. David first won the Town for the NDC in 2003 and held it until 2013. A fallout with the Tillman Thomas-led NDC sent him to the NNP, which he represented in the seat in 2018 and 2022. A fallout with the NNP's leadership process led him to found the DPM. Personal popularity did not carry a brand-new party.

THREE HUNDRED AND SIXTY-SEVEN VOTERS

Against the NDC alone, the NNP would have needed 367 voters to switch sides to win the Town in 2026, or 734 more supporters to turn out. But the real arithmetic is simpler. The NNP and the DPM together were three votes short. A reunited opposition in the capital starts the next election within touching distance.

WHAT CAN BE DONE: A FOUR-YEAR PLAN FOR THE CAPITAL

The Town of St. George does not need a political earthquake. It needs the NNP to repair what it broke.

Year one, 2027: heal the split. Open talks with Mr. David's supporters and with the branch members who resigned, and create a clear route back for any who wish to return. Rebuild a working constituency executive, with officers who live in the seat.

Year two, 2028: choose a candidate who lives in the constituency, through the party's own process and endorsed by all its factions, and commit to that person for two elections. Open a permanent office in town.

Year three, 2029: give each of the 12 polling divisions a captain. Hold the National Stadium divisions, where a united opposition already leads, and win back the older town divisions at Marryshow House and the SDA School, where the margin was a handful of votes.

Year four, 2030: run on a few local commitments, repeated everywhere, rather than a long manifesto. Serve year-round. Help that arrives only at campaign time reads as transactional; show up when nothing is at stake.

THE LESSON FOR EVERY NNP SEAT

The Town of St. George was not lost to the NDC. It was lost to a division that began inside the NNP, at a convention nearly two years before polling day. Every other volume in this series will return to the same theme: in 2026, the NNP's own decisions decided how badly each seat went.

In the capital, unity alone would have been worth the seat.

Two-party share excludes the DPM and minor candidates (2026: CHGCP 5). In 2018 and 2022 Peter David was the NNP candidate. 2026 figures are provisional results from the Parliamentary Elections Office, all 12 polling divisions verified.

WHAT IT MEANS FOR 2030/31

1. Heal the split first: unity alone was worth the seat in 2026.
2. Own the branch: keep a working constituency executive years before the writ.
3. Live in the seat, and be chosen early through the party's own process.
4. Win on your own brand, strong enough to hold against the national tide.
5. Three promises, not hundreds: a few local commitments, repeated everywhere.
6. Serve year-round: help that arrives only at campaign time reads as transactional.
7. Hold the National Stadium divisions, where a united opposition already leads.
8. Win back the old-town divisions decided by a handful of votes.
